

WORKBOOK—SECTION FOUR

Your SEEK Story Framework

Use this section to build the narrative context for a learning project. SEEK grounds your learner in meaning before asking for effort.

The Story Foundation

16. What is the name of your learning project — course, program, training, coaching relationship, or curriculum? Learning Basic Web Development

17. Who is the central character of this story? (The learner themselves, a fictional user, a professional persona, etc.)

The central character is a beginner who is learning how to create websites and wants to become more confident with coding.

18. What challenge or problem does this character face at the beginning? Be specific and vivid.

The learner does not know how HTML, CSS, and JavaScript work together. They may feel confused when their code does not work and do not yet know how to find and fix mistakes.

19. What does the world look like once this character has successfully completed the learning journey?

The learner can create a functional website from scratch, understand the basic code behind it, troubleshoot common problems, and confidently make changes to their own projects.

The Narrative Arc

20. Write a 2-3 sentence story opener you could use to begin your course, session, program, or module. Make it personal and specific.

You have an idea for a website, but turning that idea into a working page can seem confusing at first. In this project, you will learn by building, testing, making mistakes, and improving your website step by step.

21. How will you weave this story throughout the material? Describe 2-3 places where the narrative will resurface.

The story will return when the learner faces coding problems and has to troubleshoot their website. It will also return when they improve their first webpage and apply what they learned to a larger project. At the end, the learner will look back at their original website and see how much they have improved.
